

How to bring out the best in your daughter

GROWING GREAT GIRLS

IAN & MARY GRANT

GROWING GREAT GIRLS

Ian and Mary Grant

DOUBLEDAY

SYDNEY • AUCKLAND • TORONTO • NEW YORK • LONDON

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted by any person or entity, including internet search engines or retailers, in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including printing, photocopying (except under the statutory exceptions provisions of the Australian Copyright Act 1968), recording, scanning or by any information storage and retrieval system without the prior written permission of Random House Australia. Any unauthorised distribution or use of this text may be a direct infringement of the author's and publisher's rights and those responsible may be liable in law accordingly.

Growing Great Girls

ePub ISBN 9781742743943
Kindle ISBN 9781742743950

A Doubleday book

Published by Random House Australia Pty Ltd

Level 3, 100 Pacific Highway, North Sydney NSW 2060

www.randomhouse.com.au

First published by Random House New Zealand in 2008

First published by Doubleday in 2008

Copyright © Ian and Mary Grant 2008

The moral rights of the authors have been asserted.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced or transmitted by any person or entity, including internet search engines or retailers, in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying (except under the statutory exceptions provisions of the Australian Copyright Act 1968), recording, scanning or by any information storage and retrieval system without the prior written permission of Random House Australia.

Addresses for companies within the Random House Group can be found at www.randomhouse.com.au/offices

National Library of Australia

Cataloguing-in-Publication Entry

Grant, Ian, 1939–

Growing great girls.

ISBN 978 1 86471 103 5 (pbk.)

Child rearing.

Parenting.

Girls.

649.133

Cover illustration by Getty Images

Cover design by Darian Causby/www.highway51.com.au

Contents

Cover

Title Page

Copyright

Imprint Page

Dedication

Introduction

Chapter 1: Your daughter's future starts now

Chapter 2: Am I welcome in the world?

Chapter 3: The nature of girls

Chapter 4: Daughters and self-esteem

Chapter 5: Girls and their culture

Chapter 6: A family in which your daughter will thrive

Chapter 7: Love and limits

Chapter 8: The middle years

Chapter 9: Betwixt and between—the pre-adolescent years

Chapter 10: Teenage girls

Chapter 11: Raising girls on your own

Chapter 12: Mothers and daughters

Chapter 13: Dads and daughters

Chapter 14: Growing girls with character and colour

Bibliography and suggested reading

Index of Searchable Terms

Also by Ian Grant

For hot parenting tips

To all the women in our lives who have contributed to make us the people we are and who have blessed us with their wisdom and feminine insight. To our mothers, grandmothers and great-grandmothers who were once girls and who became women of character and resourcefulness, leaving us a heritage of fine example, humour and leadership.

And to our three small granddaughters, Ariella, Petra and Ruby, who have won our hearts, and whom we hope will blossom in the stream of womanhood inherited from their mothers and grandmothers.

Ian and Mary Grant

Listening to a girl's story will help her retain her own voice

Since the publication of Growing Great Boys many parents have asked when we would be writing a similar book on girls. To be perfectly honest, although we conduct 'hot tips' seminars on the subject of raising girls, and regularly read books and papers on girls in order to keep up with current research we have been slightly hesitant about the idea of a book on the subject. In addition to our two adult sons, and one very lovely adult daughter, we have six young grandsons who have been very much part of our lives for the last seven or eight years. We haven't personally experienced close relationships with little girls in recent years.

At the same time, we were gradually convinced that there might be a place for a book of this genre on girls, and when our children last year presented us with the gift of three little granddaughters we started to become really motivated about the project. However, it is more than just our little granddaughters that has motivated us.

It seems that more than ever before our culture is becoming aggressive towards girls. Parents feel they are fighting a strong tide of commercial interests and media pressure. A cursory search of the internet will convince you that this is no illusion. It quickly becomes apparent that while those who work with pre-teens, such as teachers and mentors, consider 'tweenagers' to be between 10 and 12 years of age, marketers who target this category of young people consider 'tweenagers' to include seven-to 12-year-olds. The proliferation of pornography and the 'slut' culture pervasive in clothing and music trends, along with an individualistic approach to much of life, all work against a girl's healthy passage into adulthood.

We have spent many hours over the last few years hearing about tragic cases of rebellious girls whose lives have gone way off track. Not all of these situations could have been avoided, but the pain felt by their distressed parents—who by this time have usually been in need of specialist counselling—is palpable. One of our aims is to help parents by providing simple ideas and put in place practices early in their daughters' lives, that might lead to a reduction in these situations.

On the other hand, it is a pleasure to meet self-assured young women living life with verve and optimism—young adults who, with the continued support of loving parents, are able to stretch their wings knowing they have been given strong roots and are well-equipped with the skills and self-knowledge to build a meaningful life. It has been an honour to watch our own daughter grow into a dignified, graceful adult, and a privilege to be parents to two daughters-in-law who possess great character and resourcefulness. All these women are confident and assured in their leadership and careers, and are great mothers.

We have written this book in the hope that in some way we will contribute to you having the best chance possible to enjoy your daughter, and the pleasure of one day launching a self-reliant, sure and loving young woman into the world. We want you to know why a girl's unique nature needs strong attachments, and to learn practical ways to provide these. And we want you to know that you can give your daughter resilience by mentoring her in a way that will provide her with inner strength and outward grace.

Counsellors have told us that, judging by OECD standards, we have the equivalent of an epidemic of anorexia and bulimia among our young girls. The rate of abuse suffered by girls (the most recent studies say one in four girls is abused) and the pervasiveness of adolescent depression means we must fight for our girls and offer them the loving shelter and protection of our wisdom.

In contrast to these negative trends, this is also a time when there are more opportunities than ever before for girls to succeed. We need to provide for them a healthy and clear path through to adulthood, so they can take advantage of these opportunities. In rushing to treat boys and girls as equal could it be that we have neglected to honour something unique about girls, something that women have always recognised—the special and different nature of girls?

This book is mainly concerned with ways to make life with your daughter more fun, ways to keep communication flowing, and ways to pass on your values to the next generation. It is sad to hear parents talk fearfully about the future, especially the teenage years, as if they are to be dreaded. We hope you can enjoy these years as some of the best of your lives, filed with memories that you can revisit for ever.

Finally, although this book has been a combined project, for the sake of simplicity we have used the first person singular. This means the text is written in Ian's words, however, Mary's editing skills, research and wide knowledge of the subject are woven into every paragraph.

Ian and Mary Grant

Your daughter's future starts now

If you have the chance at parenthood, look upon it with a sense of mystery and awe. You are given the joy of watching life afresh, and the chance to help another being take flight into the riches and mystery of life. The very clay of which our world is made is for a brief moment placed in your hands.

— Kent Nerburn, Simple Truths

I've just ordered woodworking plans for a small girl's doll's house, complete with miniature furniture and electric lighting. It will be my second woodworking project, following the little red rocking-horse made for a first birthday. The impetus behind this new burst of creative energy is three adorable granddaughters, all born within the last few months.

After years of building trucks and diggers for machine-orientated grandsons I am excited by the idea of these new projects. There is something about a girl that offers parents a different perspective on parenting. Her natural desire for relationships and, almost from birth, her tendency to make eye contact and respond to verbal communications rapidly begins to weave its magic in the hearts of parents and grandparents.

There are so many things to enjoy about your daughter. Her natural desire for connection and her innate ability to nurture, whether it be a doll, a pet or a friendship, mean she longs to be part of a loving family. Within her own self she has these qualities and they are your greatest ally in building strong attachments to see her through what many regard as the difficult teenage years. When you see or play with a small girl you sense the potential in her young life and you hope that she will retain her innocence and sense of self. You hope that she will keep that clear-eyed way she has of looking right into your eyes without shame or fear. Yet we hear so many stories about the ways in which our culture is toxic to girls, and about the many hurdles they will face when growing up in our individualistic and materialistic society, where so often the underlying question is 'Do you measure up?'

Your loving consistency, and the love and interest of her wider family, are vitally important to a girl's self-esteem right through her teen years.

A concept that tends to resonate with men is that of investment banking; the idea that to be successful you have to be in for the long haul; that investing wisely at the outset and hanging in through the highs and the lows will bring about a good result in the end. There are significant parallels with this when parenting girls. The key issues are your involvement with her from the start, a resolute commitment to her no matter what, and a strong vision as to what sort of young woman you, as parents, would like to launch into the world.

In this book we have endeavoured to cover the years from the day of your daughter's birth until her late teens, with the awareness that she will need involved, loving parenting through all these years. Even as a teenager, when she is sophisticated in areas such as operating electronic devices, and appears independent and highly opinionated, because of her innate nature and biology your daughter will need intimacy and connection. Your loving consistency, and the love and interest of her wider family, are vitally important to a girl's self-esteem right through her teen years. It is not only the frontal lobes of a teenager's brain (which control risk-assessment and future thinking) that are not fully developed. Your daughter's unique female make-up means that her greatest challenge during this time will be learning to understand herself—her emotions and feelings, her physiology, and her sometimes hormonally driven energy levels. As parents we can be great allies in confirming the message in her adolescent heart that she is valuable, worthy and lovable.

This is why each stage in your daughter's life is significant, and each will provide building blocks to help her to embrace the next step healthily. The years preceding adolescence are so important. If she goes into her teenage years with only her good looks, she will be in deep trouble. During the middle years of school you have a window of opportunity to communicate and connect with her and help her develop skills. Your daughter will be keen to know what is right and wrong. She is Okay with black and white, with rules, and for a few years she will really enjoy being part of the family and learning about and taking on board its values and principles.

Often during these years girls are full of confidence and willing to try a whole range of new physical challenges. This is your opportunity for family camping holidays, excursions of all sorts, tramps, as well as family stories, traditions and discussions around the dinner table. You need to capitalise on this time. It is the equivalent in white-water rafting of the quiet part of the river when you have time to coach 'rookie rafters' in all the skills they will need before you get to the rapids. It is when you would teach them about how to paddle, the best way to handle the tricky bits, and about teamwork. The goal you have in mind is that the rapids will be an enjoyable challenge and a test of character, not a disaster area.

A parent's role

Your role is really to be an encourager, to send your daughter into her teenage years with a 'full emotional tank' with the affection and approval she needs as well as the skills and interests that will keep her connected in different ways with others. Your messages of approval and wisdom should fill her memory bank, giving her a resilience that comes from knowing she has been prepared well with the skills she will need. You will need to provide her with boundaries about her behaviour within the family and about how she allows others to treat her. Most of all, if she learns from you that she can play after she has done what she is expected to do as a family member, then she will have the foundation for good EQ—emotional intelligence. No matter how many Baby Einstein videos your daughter has watched, if she does not have the basic building blocks of empathy and self-discipline her life will lack a framework and heart. EQ is the greatest gift your good parenting will secure for her.

The future for girls

Girls growing up today have so many options. The doors to just about any career are open to them, and society tends to support both their equality and their autonomy. Educationally, girls have opportunities that no other generation has enjoyed and, according to all reports, they are achieving academic success above that of their male peers. At the same time, however, there are particular challenges that are unique to the technologically saturated age into which this generation of girls has been launched.

In his book The Wonder of Girls, Michael Gurian suggests that the individualised, materialistic culture in which we live actually fights against a girl's need for intimacy and connection. Sadly, at the same time, our society takes less care to maintain the boundaries that should protect them.

The age of innocence is dead

Richard Lander, a Hollywood producer and the father of three young girls, a decade or so ago developed the first internet filter system, called max.com. Lander concluded, from what he saw happening in Hollywood, that the 'age of innocence' was dead. Even then, he said, there were a million paedophiles surfing the internet at any one time. More than a third of all traffic on the internet is pornography, and the largest group of accessors of pornography is 12-to 17-year-old boys. This means that girls are growing up in a society where there is a far greater tendency for men and boys to have a one-dimensional view of women, and where there is a proportion of boys who believe that women actually like the sort of demeaning activity portrayed in pornographic images.

The pervasiveness of pornography has exploded with the internet, and we parents need to adjust our vigilance accordingly.

It is not just the internet: all branches of the media expose even young girls to a wide range of adult concepts. Long before they are ready, girls (and their parents) face challenges and decisions about drugs, alcohol and sex. Our culture has pushed the fast-forward button for girls, and some suffer terribly from being prematurely accelerated into a risky and unprotected adolescence.

Since society is doing less for girls' welfare, parents need to do more. We need to be more vigilant and take a more proactive role in creating a childhood for our girls in which they will thrive.

Fortunately, the best response to all these new challenges is the time-proven formula of parental love and coaching. The basics of parenting girls are still the same as they have always been. Parents need to be both advisors and cheerleaders. We need to make sure that from their earliest days we give our daughters quality time, physical closeness and warm, loving eye-contact.

The great thing about raising our daughters is that we don't have to do it all on our own. Though Mums and Dads will always be the major influences in their lives, many adult women point to the powerful influence of other role models as they were growing up. Grandparents, uncles and aunts, coaches, Girl Guide leaders and teachers can all influence girls and inspire them to go for it and to take on hurdles rather than avoid them.

We need to be more vigilant and take a more proactive role in creating a childhood for our girls in which they will thrive.

When we visited our nine-week-old granddaughter in London recently I was amazed at her concentration as she sat on my lap and I read to her. I had to compete with Grandma, who is an amazing baby whisperer, and I was delighted to discover once again the truth of the natural tendency of little girls to respond to verbal connections. She seemed to enjoy the tones and rhythm of my voice.

(as well as the puzzling pictures!) as I read one of my favourite books— Lynley Dodd's Hairy Maclary from Donaldson's Dairy—and it became our little ritual. Even at that age she tuned in.

From the start, plenty of conversation, emotional availability and fun will provide a backdrop for your daughter to explore the world and build confidence in her own perceptions.

Give your daughter security

The kind of people that a baby grows up amongst will greatly affect the shape and the wiring of its mental faculties. Is the family environment relaxed or aggressive, quiet or lively, funny or deadly serious? The baby's brain responds and grows accordingly. Early in its life the adrenaline thermostat—the amount of adrenaline it is accustomed to—is set to handle what is a normal level of stress for that family.

— Steve Biddulph, Raising Babies

Be the big person who communicates confidence and creates structure and warmth in your home. One of the key conclusions in a 10-year study led by Dr Burton White of Harvard University was that the greatest influence in building good minds in young children was parents who excelled at three key functions. They were superb organisers and designers of their child's environment; they permitted short, focused interruptions so they could comfort, convey information and answer questions; and they were firm in discipline while simultaneously showing great affection.

Never undervalue the significant role you have as a parent. Whether society recognises it or not, your contribution is indispensable in growing capable, loving adults.

The foundations are simple

A tiny baby's survival depends on her symbiotic relationship with her mother. A child who is badly nurtured will suffer from a fear that the relationship will fail. She will fear that she will not survive if she is not 'plugged into' this person. That insecurity carries over into adult life, and unhealthy, dependent relationships from this type of neurotic fear and neediness often become generational.

Fortunately you do not need a million dollars or a PhD in child psychology to meet all your daughter's needs. You just need time and your natural love and willingness to be a parent.

We recently watched a documentary in which a childhood expert was called in to help parents whose daughter of 18 months was a chronic non-sleeper. Several experts had already been consulted, and the parents had concluded that the child was so intelligent she was always on the alert, and so did not sleep. After observing the family dynamics for several days the experienced, motherly psychologist who had been called in concluded that, 'Yes, this child is very bright, and she is on alert because she is anxious. She knows that her parents are not confident in being the big people—they don't seem to know what to do—and so she is not convinced that everything is safe if she goes to sleep.'

The counsellor's advice was simple. Create a regular routine in which there is predictability and order, thereby reassuring your little one that everything is as it should be. The simple routines of dinner, playtime, bath, story and bedtime were the key to this child feeling secure and sleeping peacefully. Within a few weeks everything was different, and Mum and Dad had begun to grow in stature as they accepted their role as the big people.

hot tip ✨

- ❶ Have a dream about the sort of young woman you would like to launch into the world. ‘See’ her in her late teens as a self-assured, optimistic, adventurous, generous, honest and loving adult.
- ❷ Remember your home is not a democracy. Eating vegetables is not open to an equal vote, neither is going to school, or what your children do on the computer.
- ❸ As your daughter heads into her teenage years there will be more negotiated decisions as you capitalise on the trust you have built up and offer her the respect she craves. But you will still protect her by allowing only age-appropriate decisions—by not offering her more freedom than her maturity can handle. To see her fly solo and coach her towards self-reliance is your ultimate goal.

in summary 📄

WHAT GIRLS NEED TO CREATE A GREAT FUTURE

Girls need:

- 📄 To be brought up by someone who is crazy about them.
- 📄 To be part of a loving family.
- 📄 Parents with a strong vision of what sort of young woman they want to launch into the world.
- 📄 Lots of warmth and fun, but also routine and predictability.
- 📄 A parent who will be the big person from the start.
- 📄 A parent who will be there for the long haul.

Am I welcome in the world?

Both mother and baby need to get to know each other by being responsive in each other's presence and learning to decipher each other's language ... This is our very first love relationship. The patterns of this dance will be the blueprint on which other relationships are built.

— Mary Sutton, child psychotherapist

Early interactions are crucial. Children smile from their early days. They even smile when they are sick. When parents see them smiling, the tendency to smile back is instinctive ... As long as there are cuddles, laughing and engaging in other close, intimate behaviour, the scene is set for a good childhood.

— Professor Hugh Foot, specialist in child psychology and social development, University of Strathclyde

If the theme of brokenness, distrust, separation enters into her primal relationship with her parents, the devastation will reverberate into the depths of her soul and identity.

— Janelle Hallman, therapist

Am I welcome in the world? Is there a place for me? Have I got permission to be here?

Every child asks these questions. Every baby girl wants to know, am I acceptable and am I lovable? We must tell her that she is.

It is a psychological law that we need to be loved into being. From their earliest interactions, the comfort and bonding a parent offers a baby provides the emotional recorder deep inside her with messages about her worth and value. Even before a baby is born, she hears the comforting rhythm of her mother's heartbeat and, scientists now tell us, she also recognises her father's.

Early bonding or attachment gives a baby the beginnings of a sense of self. For nine months she has listened to her mother's heartbeat alongside her own, and her mother's voice is familiar and reassuring. Humans do not have the innate instincts of other animals. Even other mammals can go looking for their mother and their food source, but a new baby cannot.

This obvious physical neediness is only the tip of the iceberg when we consider what a new baby needs from a parent. It is the stroking and talking and cuddling that actually sequence your baby's brain and her emotional memory. A healthy mother pours love and life into her baby—she gently strokes the outline of her newborn, and in this way lets her know that she is welcome, is gorgeous and gives her a sense of 'being'. And this responsive type of parenting provides a way of getting to know your baby, learning to be open to her cues and establishing her sense of well-being. It is the basis of helping your daughter 'feel right', and when a child feels right she is more likely to want to please her parents and therefore to learn to act right and to be a joy to those around her.

Making the right connections

A newborn's brain is unfinished in many ways, and it is her parents' loving interactions that wire her malleable brain for the future. A baby's brain grows by two-thirds after she is born, and to do this it needs the right stimulation. A baby only grows the right parts and wires up the right connections if we provide the right experiences at the right time. And fortunately these tend to be the experiences that happen normally in a loving family where parents sing, talk and play with their little one and offer her the calm predictability of a loving home. A baby's brain is especially sensitive to the emotional tone of her surroundings. So talk to your daughter naturally as you go about changing and feeding her; chat about mundane things and tell her where you are going and what you are doing. This is all reassuring and comforting to her.

Among some of the amazing discoveries of neuroscience over the past decade is the fact that 11 million neuron pathways develop each second in an infant's brain—you could say that parents are literally co-creating galaxies of neuroconnections with their children. Caressing a baby lowers a stress hormone that is known to damage the developing brain. And evidence now shows that attentive caregiving even influences DNA production during the first year of a human's life.

These neuroconnections play an important role in the years that follow. Apparently they affect a person's ability to lead a satisfying life, to form healthy relationships, and to make ethical decisions. Tragically, many parents still think that a young baby only needs to be fed, kept warm and have her nappies changed. They miss the vital fact that it is their presence and comforting words that lay down in this pre-verbal time their daughter's ability to be optimistic, to think logically and to feel good about herself.

Trust and abandonment are the issues for your baby in the first year of her life. Our brains are a bit like wet concrete—if we register deep in our pre-verbal memory that we are not wanted, have been abandoned or are not safe, it is very hard to erase these effects in later life. If a baby's needs, cues and signals are responded to promptly, consistently and lovingly, she learns that the world can be relied upon and is predictable. Trust is built and attachment grows as both the new mother and her baby experience their relationship as emotionally and physically enjoyable.

Tell your daughter she is lovely otherwise she will spend the rest of her life trying to prove she is capable.

–Drs John and Agnes Sturt, Created for Love

hot tip 🌟

- A soothing routine and your familiar presence are important for your baby. So are chatting and smiles, music, dancing and things to touch and look at, especially your family's faces.

• It is very important that a new mother has lots of support. Her well-being will be reflected in her baby's feelings of worth.

In his 21-year study at Otago University, in which more than a thousand children were traced from birth to the age of 21, Dr Phil Silva concluded that the things that matter to young children don't necessarily relate to wealth or having all the baby gear that is peddled to new parents these days. On the contrary, he suggested that 'poor circumstances and adversity can be overcome by good parenting'. Dr Silva concluded that it is important to focus on just three basics if a young child is to thrive: care must be consistent; the early experience of the child should be rich; and children need to be loved.

None of these basics cost money, and they can be incorporated into your home and lifestyle with simplicity. So sing and dance with your baby and involve her in your daily life. Keep her with you as you move from room to room, talk to her as you go about your tasks, let her watch you and touch different textures like the wool of a lamb, dried leaves and sand at the beach. Soothing and cuddling, as well as outings in the buggy or visits to the zoo, all make up the beginnings of a rich childhood.

Enjoy your baby!

Don't think of time caring for your young child as wasted moments away from your career or workplace. Think of it rather as a special time, when as you nurture your baby's earliest feelings about herself you also have time to nurture yourself. If you can see this season in your life as a time to enjoy a simpler rhythm of life and perhaps to pursue friendships, creative activities or some active sport, then both you and your daughter will benefit.

The smile on a mother's face reassures her daughter that the world is a good place. A baby really doesn't see herself as separate from her mother. Until those more feisty months around two years of age, when she is naturally and healthily breaking away, and she discovers the words 'no', 'me', 'mine' and 'I do it', she will look to you to tell her who she is and what she is worth.

If you have to make sacrifices to be with your daughter in the first three years of her life, they will be sacrifices well worth making. This is a vital time in which to be available to reassure and protect her, to build strong attachments and to really get to know your daughter.

All of us, from the cradle to the grave, are happiest when life is organised as a series of excursions, long or short, from the secure base provided by our attachment figures.

— John Bowlby, psychiatrist and father of attachment theory

During a recent talk to a group of professionals on a very popular subject, work-life balance and parenting, I was a little bit on tenterhooks because many of those in the audience came from a profession that specialises in adversarial skills. After I had presented my talk I was joined by a group of three professional women, all of whom happened to be pregnant. One of the women commented, 'We really found that worthwhile, and reinforced our decision to take substantial time off after the arrival of our babies.' One of the women, who was very pregnant, said she was planning to take three years off after observing her more senior colleagues. She described one senior partner in her firm as feeling isolated from her two rebellious teenagers. ‘She has had them in daycare since they were born and now regrets the years in which nannies spent more time with her children than she did.’

With all the research that is now available concerning the first three years of a child’s life, much of it reinforcing the significance of those years for bonding and attachment as well as brain development, it is unfortunate that professional women still feel so much pressure to get back to work so soon. If your daughter has the gift of your presence for the first two to three years of her life, this may be more significant for her future welfare than the high school she attends. This is a message young parents rarely hear these days, as we rush mothers back to work and minimise their value to their children and to the nation.

The consensus among child experts is that the secret of raising confident, loving and happy children is developing strong parent–child bonds, and the foundation for those bonds is laid down in the first months and years. It is what is called sensitive availability. As Michael Gurian notes in his book Boys and Girls Learn Differently, ‘A child’s brain needs bonding and attachment to fully grow and learn; without attachment it does not grow well—behaviourally, psychologically or intellectually.’

If you do need to use childcare in the first two years of your daughter’s life, look for a caregiving arrangement that will allow you to have as much involvement as possible with your child and will entail minimal transitions. Every transition tends to cause anxiety for a small baby. If possible, arrange for daycare in your own home. A loving grandma or a situation where you share caregiving with one other family is better for young babies than a large daycare; babies are able to relate to only a few adults and need one consistent, familiar person to whom they can attach.

hot tip 🌟

- If you don’t have to, don’t feel pressured to rush back to full-time employment and leave your young baby for long periods of time in care. Maybe you can choose less lofty lifestyle goals for a few years in order to take pressure off yourself.

The Circle of Security

The Circle of Security is a project that aims to help parents who in their own developmental history may have had little experience of trust and confidence in another. It is designed to give them the tools to parent their children in a way that will build strong attachments and sensitive responsiveness. The rationale behind the Circle of Security is that when children feel safe they are wired to be interested in their world and go out to explore. Yet while they are exploring, children look to their caregivers to act as a secure base. Sometimes they want their parents to be with them by watching, sometimes they need help, and sometimes they want their parents to enjoy or even delight in their play. While exploring, children will inevitably need to come back to be closer to their parent at some stage, because they may need comfort, help with their feelings, protection or an experience of shared delight. Children look to their caregivers to be a support and a safe haven.

The two principles for parents that are reinforced by the Circle of Security are:

- Always be bigger, stronger, wiser and kind.
 - ~~Whenever possible follow your child's need. Whenever necessary take charge.~~
-

On their website, www.circleofsecurity.com, the programme's developers say:

Sometimes when parents try to take charge and act bigger and stronger they sacrifice being kind and become mean and harsh. Parents who act this way often believe they must become aggressive and evoke fear to have the respect of their child. Other parents, when they try to be kind, give up being bigger and stronger, abdicate their leadership, and allow the child to run the relationship. It is an ongoing challenge for all parents to be simultaneously bigger, stronger and kind and to have the wisdom to understand a child's need for security rests on the parent's ability to provide this all-important function.

They quote child psychologist Dr Karlen Lyons-Ruth, who says, 'A parent who can provide a secure base and safe haven for a child allows the child to develop a "psychological immune system":

While your immune system does not guarantee you will never get sick, it does provide the crucial mechanism for healing when you do. Children with secure attachments have caregivers they can go to in times of stress who will help them calm themselves and solve problems. Evidence from a number of researchers shows that children who are secure do better across a broad range of developmental outcomes.

This is a 'difference that makes a difference', and one that caregivers can do something about.

However, the real spin-off of caring for your child in those early years is that you as a mother or father will fall in love with your child. Relative to mothers of insecure children, mothers of preschool age 'secure' children display more positive moods, delight in and enjoyment of their children, non-intrusive play and teaching, and provide a relaxed home atmosphere.

In other words, being the big person means being kind, loving and warm but firm, and providing for physical needs along with being emotionally available. If your toddler tries to boss you, for example, by demanding that you come with her to play on the slide when you are finishing your coffee, you could go with her immediately, if you don't want the rest of your drink. Alternatively, you could say, 'Yes, Mummy will come and play with you on the slide when I have finished my coffee; in the meantime you can sit here by me or you can play by yourself on the slide while I finish my coffee and watch you.' You are still giving her emotional support even if you cannot come immediately she wants you.

What we now know about the first three years of a baby's life is that it provides the foundation for her future life's potential. So as much as possible enter into the joy of raising your daughter. Enroll her in music and movement classes, take her to the library, talk to her not just in monosyllables but in full, complex sentences and, if you want to, learn baby sign language. You will be surprised at how much your daughter is absorbing and how she will respond, and you will be building into her reservoir of language your own understanding of and delight in this little person.

- click British Dreadnought vs German Dreadnought: Jutland 1916 \(Duel, Volume 31\) pdf, azw \(kindle\)
- click La belleza del mundo book
- download online The Invention of Paris: A History in Footsteps
- download online The Story of My Life pdf, azw \(kindle\), epub, doc, mobi

- <http://aseasonedman.com/ebooks/Lying-to-Live--Denim-Diaries--Book-6-.pdf>
- <http://wind-in-herleshausen.de/?freebooks/The-Tao-of-Physics.pdf>
- <http://pittiger.com/lib/Across-the-Nightingale-Floor--Tales-of-the-Otori--Book-1-.pdf>
- <http://junkrobots.com/ebooks/Naturalizing-Phenomenology--Issues-in-Contemporary-Phenomenology-and-Cognitive-Science--Writing-Science-.pdf>